It was also recommended that projects be encouraged to include more conservatism in base estimates early in the process and be required to carefully evaluate all key project assumptions including design heritage credits. At a presentation before the Goddard Space Flight Center Symposium in June 2008, a member of the Aerospace Corporation discussed perspectives on mission cost and schedule performance trends, building on his teams review of 40 NASA robotic science missions. The teams findings included the following: While estimates become more accurate as a project matures, the greatest growth manifests itself late in the project during integration and test. Data highlighted that the primary reason for cost and schedule growth is internal project technical and development issues often associated with instruments. Initial project estimates may be unreliable due to design and technology immaturity and inherent optimism. Better technical and programmatic appraisal early in the life cycle...
