Not illustrated. 1882 Excerpt: .to levy an assessment on stockholders to pay debts based on the aggregate indebtedness, without regard to such limitation on their liability, and the fact that it is made pursuant to an order of the court obtained by the receiver does not make it conclusive on the stockholders as to the amount of their liability. In a case where the dissolution of the corporation was voluntary, evidence that prior thereto the company had made fraudulent preferences is admissible in an action brought by the receiver against a stockholder to recover on an assessment to pay debts. The proceedings for dissolution may be attacked by proof of any fact showing that the company was not one of those empowered to avail itself of the act of 1853. Chap. 361, Laws of 1852, has no application to corporations formed under the act of 1848. This action was brought...
