It grows with use, and lessens with disuse. It can be inherited and transmitted. Moderately indulged in, it is sanitarily and socially a blessing; immoderately, it becomes a curse to its victim, and a social pest. 303. It appears, then, that physiology and experience, and assuredly also the precepts of religion, offer no objection to the moderate use of the various good things which Providence has furnished for us, and among them, of the wine that maketh glad the heart of man. 304. The great lesson to be inculcated, in respect to eating as well as drinking, is temperance. In order to bring the body into the highest degree of vigour, as in the process of training for different athletic exercises, the strictest temperance is necessary, and St. Paul uses this fact in illustration when he says: -- Every man that striveth for the master, is temperate in all things. Early rising and early going to bed, regular exercise not extended to fatigue, the moderate use of nutritious food and of fermented liquors, and abstinence from ardent spirits, and severity of mind, are the conditions scrupulously observed in the training of the athletic, and, although our object should be merely so far to invigorate the body that it may be a useful servant to the controlling mind, attention to such conditions will prove to us of inestimable benefit. CHAPTER V. PERSONAL CLEANLINESS, BATHING, AND CLOTHING....
