Excerpt: .hard in dry weather that it sometimes becomes difficult to cultivate, and so no mulch can be formed. BOTTOM SOILS. The bottom soils along the rivers which run through the Black Prairie are principally of two kinds. Those which are derived from overflow waters which have drained the limestone prairie lands are of a dark color and consist almost entirely of a sandy loam, loam and clay, with a brownish subsoil. The creek bottoms of the Black Prairie also consist largely of the black clay soil which has been washed from the Black Prairie soils. These soils are very productive and especially adapted to corn, cotton, alfalfa and sorghum. Oats do well but produce a very heavy and large quantity of straw. The crops mentioned are those which are grown the most extensively on the loam and clay soils and fine yields are made. The sandy loam soil also produces good yields of these crops, but it is especially adapted to truck crops. The other kind of bottom soils are those of a reddish color, and in this region they are found principally along the Brazos river. The soil may be brown in some cases with a red subsoil. These soils consist of loam, sandy loam and clay principally. They are formed by the settling of sediment, consisting of soil washed from the Red Lands Country, which the Brazos river drains. These soils are very productive as are most well drained bottom soils, and...
